UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

UJA Federation's mission is to preserve and strengthen the quality of Jewish life in Greater Toronto, Canada, Israel and around the world through philanthropic, volunteer and professional leadership. Year after year, UJA's Annual Campaign allows UJA to care for our most vulnerable: build and strengthen Jewish identity and education, invest in Israel and overseas, and promote Jewish/Israel advocacy, while also creating infrastructure throughout the GTA that serves not only the Jewish community but also the community at large.

THE JULIA AND HENRY KOSCHITZKY CENTRE FOR JEWISH EDUCATION

The Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education, UJA Federation's educational pillar, is dedicated to strengthening, enriching and promoting the quality of Jewish education in our schools and the greater Jewish Community. The CJE ensures its continuity by providing leadership and supporting a sustainable system of quality Jewish schools and programs attracting the greatest number of students. The CJE serves more than 70 day schools and supplementary programs, 1,500 educators and 16,000 students across the GTA.

Introduction

Why Tuition?

Tuition, and the ways we talk about tuition, impacts all parts of a school's functioning as well as parent and community perception of the school. In nearly all schools tuition is the largest revenue stream, fueling the school's operations and catalyzing its mission. In Toronto's Jewish day schools, tuition represents, on average, 83% of revenue.

Tuition allows schools to survive and thrive, sustaining quality and driving new initiatives. Tuition impacts teaching and learning, staffing, and the value-added programs critical to our schools' success. The quality of education and the variety of programs offered by schools are dependent on tuition.

Tuition also impacts the perceived value of the school. The framing of tuition impacts the ways parents relate to the school, including the admissions and enrollment process. Tuition informs the demographics and diversity of our student body and impacts the ways the community and donors view day school education. Tuition, and the way it is packaged, is a major indicator of affordability.

Nearly three years ago, in researching the Greenbook on Jewish Day School Financial Sustainability and Affordability published by the Jewish Funders Network and the AVI CHAI Foundation, we uncovered some of the ways schools use tuition to increase recruitment and affordability for middle income families. As we, in Toronto, seek to make Jewish day school more affordable for these families we sought to learn from models employed by other Jewish day schools.

This Publication

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education is dedicated to buttressing the financial sustainability and affordability of Jewish day school education. Through our work in partnership with local day schools and national agencies, we seek to develop the data and ideas to sustain and strengthen Jewish day schools.

In Toronto we are undergoing two parallel processes which led to this report. First, we are seeking to revise our current tuition assistance program. The program, which was developed by UJA Federation nearly a half century ago, currently serves 2,300 students in fourteen schools each year. While the system goes a long way to make day school more affordable for those in need, its application and framing needs to be updated. Second, as many schools and communities are doing, we are seeking ways to make day schools more affordable and accessible to middle income families. Our hope is that by learning from the experience of others, we can improve our own practices.

This report is best described as a landscape study of tuition initiatives employed by day schools across North America. During the summer of 2015, we reviewed the websites of hundreds of Jewish day schools to discover how they charge tuition and, just as importantly, how they present these charges. To be clear, in this early stage of research, we did not pursue schools any farther. We did not contact them to inquire about the rationale for their tuition structure or presentation nor did we inquire about the impact of the initiative on enrollment or affordability. These, of course, are worthy questions to ask but will be undertaken only in the second phase of this research to be conducted in 2016. During this second phase, we will seek to learn about specific initiatives in greater depth.

We base the report below on what we found online. We recognize that some websites may be out of date and others can only be fully understood within the particular context of the school. We also recognize that the conversations that happen with school admissions professionals are critical to a family's understanding of tuition, but our research did not benefit from these conversations. We apologize for omissions and errors in reporting.

It is also important to note that nearly every Jewish day school has some kind of tuition assistance or subsidy program. These programs are not the focus of this study and were not included in the pages below. Notwithstanding these caveats, our community and school leadership in Toronto has found this data helpful, and we hope you do too.

Reading this report

Categorizing tuition initiatives can be difficult. Many of the initiatives & discounts we studied could fall into multiple categories and, without knowing the underlying goals of the initiatives, categorizing can be even more challenging. Nevertheless, we roughly created twelve groupings. It may be helpful to skim individual sections, or read particular sections of interest more in-depth.

For each initiative we sought to give a brief overview of the initiative/discount including school information, eligibility criteria, the application process, and baseline school tuition. Throughout, we tried to include links to the initiative/discount website and/or application in order to offer a jumping-off point for more information.

Community Wide Initiatives

Throughout North America, local Federations and Foundations support Jewish day schools. While a number of communities have facilitated multi-school tuition assistance initiatives, it is relatively recent that communities have launched middle-income affordability initiatives. These initiatives take many forms - those administered by the school or administered centrally; those fully funded by the community or with shared funding between school and community; those focused on affordability and those matching affordability with recruitment of new students/families; those focused on particular ages including points of entry (early childhood) and points of attrition (high school).

One unique initiative cited in this category is the Kohelet Fellowships. While most initiatives target funding based solely on demographic information such as household income, grade level, and number of children, this program requires parents to commit to two years of Jewish learning in order to receive funding for their children's tuition.

While most of these initiatives— particularly those targeting middle income families – rely on donor funds, some have leveraged government funding aimed at affording school choice. Particular examples can be found at the end of this section citing initiatives in Florida and Ohio.

Middle Income Initiatives

In the Greenbook on Jewish Day School Financial Sustainability and Affordability, we introduced middle income as follows:

Since the economic crisis in 2008, tuition at Jewish day schools has continued to rise while wages remained stagnant. Among those most affected are middle income families. These families, who often do not qualify for traditional income-based financial aid but struggle to afford full tuition, have been forced to make difficult decisions regarding their children's enrollment in day schools. As one Head of School observed, there is a "unique psychology of middle income families," who are donors in order organizations in which they are involved, but are forced to be askers in day schools.

Some have noted a barbell effect in day schools: a large proportion of low-income families who qualify for financial aid, a small number of middle income families who struggle to afford full tuition, and a large proportion of high-income families who pay full tuition. As tuition increases outpaces inflation, schools are faced with requests for financial aid from families who would not have applied ten years ago."

Three years ago, when researching the Greenbook, there may have been a half dozen middle income initiatives across North America. Today, as we conducted this survey, we counted twenty-two school based initiatives in addition to the community-wide models discussed above. While the challenges of affording day school continue to mount for middle income families, it is comforting to see a growing number of initiatives targeted at tackling the challenge.

We broke these initiatives into four categories based on what families receive:

- iCap: Family's tuition is capped at a certain percentage of household AGI, usually 15-18%.
- Flat dollar amount or percent discount: Eligible families receive a flat amount or percent off tuition which does not vary, even with more children at the school. The amount varies between $2,500-$10,000 or up to 18%.

- Number of students and income: Discounts are based on BOTH a family's income AND the number of children attending the school. Families either receive a dollar amount discount or percentage discount.
- Number of students: Discounts are based on the number of family members attending the school, without variance based on income. Discounts range from 8%-15%.

Reviewing the initiatives currently in the market, four questions surfaced:

1. What are the goals of the initiative? To what extent is the goal to attract new students, who otherwise would not have enrolled in Jewish day school, and to what extent is the initiative designed to make day school more affordable for existing families.
2. How is middle income defined? Is it simply defined as household income falling between an upper and lower limit or does the calculation include factors such as net-assets, number of children, etc?
3. How is the initiative marketed or framed? Recognizing the 'unique psychology' of middle income families, how does the initiative demonstrate rigor in its stewarding of communal funds, while also addressing the reluctance of middle income families to ask for assistance?
4. How long is the funding available, and how does it change over time? While some initiatives offer an incentive for only a few years others guarantee assistance throughout a student's tenure in the school. These decisions impact on the financial model of the initiative, a parent's perception of affordability, and school recruitment/retention strategies.

New Student Discounts

Recruiting new students is key to the sustainability of any day school. Many industries have adopted models wherein consumers receive a discount to ‘hook’ them into the quality of the product. The New York Times offers a trial digital subscription for 99 cents, internet providers offer discounts for the first three or six months of services, even Jewish camping - through the Foundation for Jewish Camp and local Federations’ One Happy Camper program – offers a $1000 discount for the first year of camping. Each of these incentives is designed to drive early enrollment, convince consumers of the quality of the product, and retain the relationship for years to come.

This strategy, called penetration pricing, can be found not only in new student discounts but in nearly every category of initiatives described in this survey. Penetration pricing is particularly effective where transaction costs are high – where, once enrolled, it’s difficult to move. This is the case in schooling, where transferring a child has not only educational and financial, but social implications as well.

What defines a ‘new’ student? Some schools offer discounts to the first child in a family to enroll while others extend it to all new students. In some schools, discounts are geared towards transfer students or students who are entering the school in certain grades. While most schools do not specify what previous schooling the child had, some discounts are geared towards students coming from public school and others have different amount if they are entering from a public school or a Jewish Day School (Shalom Torah Academy of East Windsor).

Finally, there are two particularly interesting programs in this category. First, Heilicher Minneapolis Jewish Day School gives their ‘new student discount’ to students returning after hiatus of one year or more, thus trying to draw those students who left back to the school. Second, the Joseph Kushner Hebrew Academy/ Rae Kushner Yeshiva High School in Livingston, New Jersey gears its program towards families who are new to the local community. In this model families must also join one of the participating synagogues. These families receive only a discount from the school, but the synagogue and JCC also provide discounts.

Flex Tuition

Flex tuition, also called “Indexed Tuition” or “Sliding Scale”, is for most schools a different framing for the financial aid process. Noteworthy, however, is the framing of the program to address the unique psychology of middle income families. While “financial aid”, “subsidies” or “tuition assistance” may deter some middle income families from participating, to many flex tuition is more palatable. Notwithstanding the more appealing name, the application process for these programs usually mirrors those of traditional tuition assistance – standing in contrast to middle income programs which usually employ a less invasive application.

Schools that have flex tuition are often transparent about what the final cost or the range of tuition cost will be based on your household income or percent of AGI. This information – both on who is eligible and what benefits students may receive – is helpful to middle income families who may otherwise not engage in the system assuming they do not qualify. Often this information is displayed through charts and graphs.

Jewish Community Professional Discounts

Jewish communal professionals are gatekeepers to Jewish day school. When their own children are enrolled, they are more likely to serve as ambassadors for the school, spreading word of mouth and encouraging others to apply. These discounts may also serve as a thank you to parents working within the Jewish community, adding a tangible benefit to important (and often undercompensated) roles in our community.

The definition of Jewish Community Professional varies by school but generally includes: Rabbis, educators, those working at a Jewish community organization, synagogues camps or other agencies. In some cases, the school includes president & board members of these agencies.

Some schools require that the parent be working a minimum number of hours or that the Jewish communal professional be the main source of income for the household. The monetary amount the discount varies widely. For schools that offer a percentage discount this varies between a 10% to 50% off total tuition and for schools that offer a monetary amount this varies from between $5,400-$10,000. In general, no financial documents are required but some schools do require verification from employer.

Referral Discounts

These discounts reward families who refer new families to the school. While the monetary reward is minimal it is still a helpful way to thank current families who serve as ambassadors for the school. One school (American Hebrew Academy in Greensboro) requires families to be paying full tuition.

Affiliation Discounts

Affiliation discounts reward those who are both synagogue members and day school families. In the survey, we did not find affiliation discounts with other Jewish organizations – JCCs, summer camps, etc. Depending on the school, discounts are offered to families who are members of any local congregation or only to those who are members of the Synagogue in which the school is housed or with which it is connected. Generally, the discounts are minimal and do not go far in offsetting the cost of tuition, but they do send an important message about cross affiliation.

While not a day school, one notable addition to this group is the case of Beth Radom Congregation, a Conservative congregation in Toronto. While we tracked day schools which offer discounts to those who are members of synagogues, Beth Radom offers a 25% discount on synagogue membership to day school families. This program both helps families financially and, perhaps more importantly, sends a clear message about the synagogue's valuing of day school education.

External Funding

As mentioned previously, funding for Jewish day school tuition is provided not only by schools but also through external sources such as Jewish organizations or governmental funding. While these are not the main source of assistance for families they do provide some financial relief.

The eligibility requirements vary- some are based on financial need, some on age and one source of funding is geared towards students who have an Individualized Education Plan (IEP).

Merit Scholarships

These scholarships are awarded based on academics, extra-curricular activities and/or involvement in community and a few are also based on need. Some of these scholarships are specifically targeted towards incoming students as a form of penetration pricing. The monetary rewards vary and some guarantee a certain amount over the student's time at the school (as long as the student is still eligible) therefore adding a level of security for parents.

Early Enrollment/Payment Discounts

Every school benefits from early enrollment and payment. Enrolling early allows schools to properly budget for the next year and paying early alleviates cash flow challenges often faced by schools. To incentivize such behaviors, some schools offer financial incentives for early enrollment and early payment. While the dollar amount is minimal for these discounts, it is still an incentive to get parents to either pay certain fees early, submit their deposit, pay tuition in full by certain date, submit application by certain date, use single payment plan or pay for tuition in certain way and therefore guarantee their child's Jewish education for another year. Many of these early bird discounts do not apply to families in the nursery or pre-school programs or to families who are on scholarship.

One unique program to highlight is at Gottesman RTW Academy in Randolph, NJ which offers for the first 30 students to register for 5 Full Days discounted tuition for as long as the child is in the ECC program for 5 Full Days. While the discount is only about $1,000-$2,000 it still is a guarantee for parents for their youngest children whose tuition is already a great financial obligation

Sibling Discounts

It's often quipped that day school tuition is the best form of birth control. A sibling discount can ease some of the heavy financial burden that makes a Jewish Day School education cost-prohibitive.

At most schools one only needs to have two children in the school, but some do require you to have at least three children. As well, some schools require students to be in certain grades (usually excluding Nursery/Pre-School) and in some cases families need to be paying full tuition.

The discount amount varies greatly between schools and is either a flat dollar or percent discount for all additional children.

In addition, there are a few schools that require families to meet a certain income level, or be new family to the school, or family needs to choose only one discount/ not receiving scholarships, or be paying full tuition.

Other Discounts

In combing through school websites we discovered a number of other forms of discount that did not seem to fit neatly into other categories.

Staff discounts afford faculty and other school staff a tangible benefit that may come at a lower cost to the school. More than the financial benefit, the school may benefit from an ability to attract more mission-appropriate staff and ensure staff's role as ambassadors. It should be noted that while some schools advertise these discounts on their website, we can assume that many more have such policies that are not advertised.

Alumni discounts, which usually do not represent a significant discount, are a nice way to thank parents who years later are still supporting the same school institution.

Two schools noted below offer grants for students in certain grades but it is unclear if there are any financial eligibility requirements. In addition, scholarships that are not merit based can be found in this category.

As well, some schools have a higher tuition then what most (if not all) families pay for tuition due to support provided by various individuals and organizations. These schools make it transparent about this difference and allow families to pay the true full cost if they wish, with the difference usually being a charitable contribution.

Soille San Diego Hebrew Day School has a discount if you are paying more than $40,000. While this is similar to a sibling discount the way it is worded opens it up to children in any grades and any number of children.

Emery/Weiner School in Houston offers new families who qualify for the regular financial aid the option to lock in monthly payments throughout the duration in either middle school and/or high school. This is a way to both draw in new families but also give them some piece of mind about how they are going to finance their child(ren)'s education.
